第一节

Dear Paul,

I'm truly sorry I failed to book tickets for the Chinese Calligraphy Exhibition as promised. I was busy with my final exam review these days and totally forgot the booking deadline.

To make up for it, I've checked the exhibition's official website and found there are standby tickets sold on site every morning. I'll go there early tomorrow to get two. Please forgive my carelessness.

Yours,
Li Hua

第二节

Li Mei devoted herself to preparing for the presentation.

She chose sweet dumplings, a traditional dish for Lantern Festival. Her mother taught her to make them—kneading glutinous rice flour, wrapping black sesame filling, and shaping small round balls. Li Mei also searched materials online, made a poster with pictures of sweet dumplings and Lantern Festival scenes, and wrote notes about their meaning: reunion and good wishes. She practiced introducing the dish repeatedly, adjusting her pronunciation to make it clear for classmates.

The presentation day finally arrived.

When Li Mei showed sweet dumplings and the poster, classmates were curious. She explained their connection with Lantern Festival, how families gather to eat them. After her speech, Pierre raised his hand, saying he once saw such dumplings in a festival event and wanted to taste. Li Mei shared her sweet dumplings, and everyone praised their taste. Many classmates said they learned about Chinese food culture. Li Mei felt proud, realizing her favorite food could bridge cultures and she no longer needed to hide her love for Chinese dishes.
